

Silver is inherited

Just as important as that a person and her name match, it is that silverware and other things end up with the right person. A silver object may once have been a party gift from a man to a woman. In the next generation, the object will be a christening gift. "The child resembled so much the man who had once given it." From generation to generation the objects are passed on, a house brand can tell the objects journey. Perhaps it is the same thought that made them put so much effort into finding the right name for the child.

The picture below the stand shows the different house brand carved into the silver spoon each time it changed hands.
